Director's Statement

I am a big fan of both science and science fiction. Science searches for answers in the present day. Science Fiction asks questions about the future. Science proves what is; science fiction asks what it means.

I've always admired filmmakers and authors who zero in on that intersection of reality and fiction. When the stories are real and truthful, but still fantastical and transportive.

The theme of this series is identity. Who are you? What makes you, you? We assume we are who we are based on our memories, our feelings. But can we trust them?

In ExHumans, dying people are cryogenically frozen to be awoken in the future. But we don't know the future. Why would anyone wake you up? But they do - and you're whole, without pain. It's a miracle. That's what you signed up for. They've cured you.

But who are they? Can you trust them? What do they really want?

You have no control over the world that has brought you back from the dead. None whatsoever.

It's like being born.

And being born has only one outcome.

Enjoy the series.
